PREFACE.

In attempting to outline the work done by American writers during the past twenty-one years, my desire has been to place before the students of American Literature, in as brief and concise a form as possible, the accomplishments of the period from 1894 to 1914. I have followed as closely as possible, in arrangement and form, Prof. S. L. Whitcomb's "Chronological Outlines of American Literature", beginning at the point where these outlines close. I am indebted to Prof. Whitcomb for suggesting the work, and for help in carrying it out.

In a work of this kind, one is confronted with a number of difficulties. The literature with which these outlines deal is so recent that critics as yet have not felt justified in ranking it. Each student of American Literature is forced, to a certain extent, to judge for himself what part of this body of work is worth while, and what is not, or what is more worth while, and what is less. While it has not been difficult to find material for these outlines, it has been difficult to make sure that all of the most important work of the period has been included. Here, the text books on American Literature are of almost no avail, for even the most recent ones include only a small part of this period. I have, therefore, been forced to rely almost wholly on sources other than textbooks for the information used in these outlines.

In some cases, I have found authorities differing as to dates, and, occasionally as to the wording of certain titles. In such cases, my attempt has been to ascertain the most reliable sources of information, and to make my own work as accurate as possible.
